On July 30, 2019, California Governor Gavin Newsom signed into law the Presidential Tax and Transparency Act (“the Act”), enacted as Senate Bill 27, which requires, among other things, presidential candidates in the California primary to have disclosed their federal tax returns for the previous five years as a precondition to appearing on the State’s partisan primary ballot.¹ By way of the above-captioned related actions, five sets of Plaintiffs seek to enjoin enforcement of that law by Defendants Governor Newsom, Alex Padilla, California’s Secretary of State, and Xavier Becerra, in ¹ The Act was codified as Chapter 7 to Part 1 of Division 6 of the California Elections Code, §§ 6880 et seq.

1 his capacity as California Attorney General.² Plaintiffs are the incumbent President, 2 Donald J. Trump, along with his reelection campaign, a second Republican candidate for 3 President, Roque De La Fuente, both the Republican National Committee and its state 4 counterpart, the California Republican Party, and eight individual California voters, 5 including members of both the Republican, Democratic and Independent Parties.

6 According to all Plaintiffs, the Act violates the so-called Qualifications Clause of 7 the United States Constitution. U.S. Const., art. II, § 1, cl. 5 (“Qualifications Clause”).
8 Four of the five lawsuits further allege that the Act violates Plaintiffs’ First Amendment 9 rights to associate and/or to access the ballot, also guaranteed by the United States 10 Constitution. In addition, two of the actions take the position that the Act also violates 11 the Fourteenth Amendment’s Equal Protection Clause. Finally, the lawsuit filed on 12 behalf of President Trump and his campaign asserts that the Act’s provisions are 13 preempted by the Ethics in Government Act of 1978, 5 U.S.C.A. App. 4, §§ 101 et seq.
14 (“EIGA”), which requires that presidential candidates disclose certain financial 15 information.

16 The Court heard oral argument on September 19, 2019, and, at the hearing’s 17 conclusion, announced its tentative decision granting a preliminary injunction enjoining 18 application of the Act insofar as it pertains to presidential candidates. This written order 19 memorializes that ruling and supersedes any and all statements made by the Court at 20 that time. For the reasons set forth below, the requests for preliminary injunctive relief 21 are GRANTED.

22 23 BACKGROUND

24
25 In 1913, the Sixteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution was ratified 26 authorizing a national income tax to be implemented through the filing of individual tax

² Newsom, Becerra and Padilla will be collectively referred to in this Memorandum and Order as “Defendants” or the “State” unless otherwise noted.

1 returns with the Internal Revenue Service. Since that time, there has never been a legal 2 requirement that any candidate for federal office disclose their tax returns as a 3 precondition to standing for election. The Act, which provides in relevant part as follows, 4 attempts to change that:

5 6883. (a) Notwithstanding any other law, the Secretary of 6 State shall not print the name of a candidate for President of 7 the United States on a primary election ballot, unless the 8 candidate, at least 98 days before the presidential primary election, files with the Secretary of State copies of every income tax return the candidate filed with the Internal Revenue Service in the five most recent taxable years.

9 Cal. Elec. Code § 6883(a). It goes on to require the Secretary of State to publish a copy 10 of the candidate's personal tax returns on the Secretary's publicly available website, 11 after redacting the returns for privacy purposes. Id. at § 6884(c). Because the Act 12 applies only to primaries and not to the general election, however, independent and 13 certified write-in candidates are not required to disclose their tax returns as a condition of 14 running for President. Id. at §§ 8300, 8600.

15 The California Legislature formally explained its justification for passing the Act in 16 a purpose statement which reads:

17 [The] State of California has a strong interest in ensuring that 18 its voters make informed, educated choices in the voting 19 booth. To this end, the state has mandated that extensive 20 amounts of information be provided to voters, including county 21 and state voter information guide. The Legislature also finds and declares that a Presidential candidate's income tax returns provide voters with essential information regarding the candidate's potential conflicts of interest, business dealings, financial status and charitable donations.

22 Id. at § 6881. Despite this attempt to couch the Act as an informational device to be 23 applied equally to all candidates, however, the legislative history and statements made 24 by state legislators during its consideration strongly suggest it was primarily intended to 25 force President Trump to disclose his tax returns.³ Indeed, at oral argument counsel for 26 ³ Trump has made extensive disclosures of his personal financial information in accordance with 27 the provisions of EIGA, but has never disclosed his tax returns themselves. Additionally, when he 28 announced his candidacy for reelection in 2020, Trump reiterated that he would not disclose his filings prior to either the 2020 primary or general elections. See Pl. Melendez' Mot., 19-cv-01506-MCE-DB, ECF

No. 17-1, 6:12-17.

1 the State expressly conceded that the Act “was prompted by President Trump’s refusal 2 to disclose his tax return when he ran for . . . office.” Transcript of September 19, 2019
3 hearing, ECF No. 37 to Case No. 19-cv-1477-MCE-DB, 55:12-15. Likewise, State 4 Senator Mike McGuire, who co-sponsored the Act in the California Senate, has 5 unequivocally indicated that “it will make presidential tax returns public in [California] just 6 in time for the 2020 election.” Pl. Melendez’ Mot., 19-cv-01506-MCE-DB, ECF No. 17-1, 7 at 5:26-27; 6:5-6. McGuire has further stated that “President Trump, if he truly doesn’t 8 have anything to hide, should step up and release his tax returns.” Id. at 5:28-6:1.

9 Defendants also describe the Act as having been enacted in response to 10 President Trump’s “break” from “customary practice” in choosing not to disclose his 11 returns. See Defs.’ Omnibus Opp, 3:22-24. But such production has hardly been 12 universal. Between 1913, when income taxes were instituted, and 1973, when President 13 Nixon opted to disclose his returns after portions were leaked, no sitting President 14 elected to furnish his returns. Melendez Mot. at 2:21-22. In addition, Nixon’s successor, 15 Gerald Ford, opted to disclose only a summary of his taxes. Id. at 2:25. Nor have 16 presidential candidates universally released their tax filings. For example, in 1992, 17 former California Governor Jerry Brown, then a candidate for the Democratic nomination 18 for President, elected not to disclose his returns. Ross Perot similarly declined to 19 disclose that same year, and in 2000, Ralph Nader also decided against disclosure. Id.
20 at 2:28-3:8. Consequently, the State’s argument that the California Legislature passed 21 the Act “to codify a custom followed by presidential candidates in the past five decades” 22 is disingenuous. Defs.’ Opp., 1:6.

23 Against this backdrop, it is no surprise that the one other time California 24 attempted to pass a law such as the one challenged here, shortly after President 25 Trump’s election, it was unsuccessful. More specifically, in 2017, the California 26 Legislature passed a bill known as SB 149 that, like the Act, would have required 27 candidates to release their returns as a precondition for appearing on the California 28 primary ballot. In analyzing that legislation before it came to a vote, however,

1 California's Office of the Legislative Counsel—a nonpartisan public agency— “concluded 2 that [SB 149] would be unconstitutional if enacted.” Cal. Comm. on the Judiciary Report, 3 Senate, March 11, 2019 at 5 (citing Ops. Cal. Legis. Counsel, No. 1718407 (Sept. 7, 4 2017)). Regardless, the Legislature approved the bill anyway and sent it to then-5 Governor Jerry Brown for his signature. Governor Brown then vetoed the legislation, 6 articulating his many reservations as follows:

7 This bill is a response to President Trump's refusal to release 8 his returns during the last election. While I recognize the 9 political attractiveness – even the merits – of getting President 10 Trump's tax returns, I worry about the political perils of 11 individual states seeking to regulate presidential elections in 12 this manner. First, it may not be constitutional. Second, it sets 13 a 'slippery slope' precedent. Today we require tax returns, but 14 what would be next? Five years of health records? A certified 15 birth certificate? High school report cards? And will these 16 requirements vary depending on which political party is in 17 power?

18 Governor Jerry Brown, Governor's Veto Message, SB 149, available at 19 https://leginfo.legislature.ca.gov/faces/billStatusClient.xhtml?bill_id=201720180SB149.
20 He concluded that conditioning ballot access on the disclosure of tax returns might 21 infringe upon settled constitutional rights, stating that “[a] qualified candidate's ability to 22 appear on the ballot is fundamental to our democratic system.” Id. Accordingly, he 23 “hesitate[d] to start down a road that well might lead to an ever escalating set of differing 24 state requirements for presidential candidates.” Id.

25 Despite both Governor Brown's warning and the Legislative Counsel's earlier 26 admonition, the lead authors of SB 149 announced their intent to reintroduce the bill 27 when California had a new Governor. See McCarthy Decl, Case No. 2:19-cv-01501-
28 MCE-DB, ECF No. 10-2, ¶¶ 5-6. And follow through they did, introducing the present Act on December 3, 2018, less than a month after Governor Newsom was elected to office. Like its predecessor, the Act was again denominated as “the Presidential Tax Transparency and Accountability Act” and contained the same material provisions as the earlier SB 149, requiring partisan candidates to submit their tax returns from the five previous years in order to appear on the primary ballot.⁴

Significantly, although no other state has enacted a requirement such as the one at issue here,⁵ California pushed the envelope even further by passing the Act as an “urgency statute” that would go into effect immediately.⁶ The Act was deemed “urgent” in this regard even though California had been conducting presidential primary elections without a tax disclosure requirement since the dawn of American income taxes more than one hundred years prior.

Given the current date for California’s 2020 presidential primary, and the fact that under the terms of the Act tax returns must be released 98 days beforehand, absent injunctive relief, partisan candidates must disclose their taxes by November 26, 2019, in order to appear on the California primary. The instant motions seek to enjoin that requirement.

⁴ The Act differs somewhat from SB 149 in that the former contains more specific directions on how candidates must present their tax returns to the California Secretary of State. In addition, the Act also applies to state gubernatorial candidates who wish to participate in the primary election. All parties agreed at the September 19, 2019, hearing, however, that the present challenges pertains only to the Act’s application to presidential primaries.

⁵ On May 1, 2017, Governor Chris Christie vetoed a similar bill, S3048, passed by the New Jersey Legislature. Melendez Mot., 3:24-25.

12 plaintiff is entitled to such relief.” Winter, 555 U.S. at 22 (citing Mazurek v. Armstrong, 13 520 U.S. 968, 972 (1997)).

14 Alternatively, under the so-called sliding scale approach, “[t]he Ninth Circuit 15 weighs [the above] factors on a sliding scale”, so that where there are “‘serious 16 questions going to the merits’ --- that is, less than a ‘likelihood of success’ on the merits - 17 -- a preliminary injunction may still issue so long as ‘the balance of hardships tips sharply 18 in the plaintiff’s favor’ and the other two factors are satisfied.” Short v. Brown, 893 F.3d 19 671, 675 (9th Cir. 2018).

20 Where the moving party alleges constitutional violations, including violations of 21 rights secured by the First Amendment, they must make a “colorable claim” that their 22 rights have been infringed or threatened with infringement, but upon this showing “the 23 burden shifts to the government to justify the restriction.” Thalheimer v. City of 24 San Diego, 645 F.3d 1109, 1117 (9th Cir. 2019) (citing Klein v. City of San Clemente,

The Court appreciates the State's desire for transparency in the political process. Requiring candidates to disclose tax returns could shed light on sources of income, potential conflicts of interest, and charitable tendencies. This information is important to a voter's ability to evaluate how a candidate's financial interests might affect future decision making. For example, in what entities or countries have candidates invested? Where have they donated? Who do they owe? These concerns are both legitimate and understandable,⁷ but are undermined when candidates offer unnecessary and irrelevant excuses for shielding the public from such information.

It is not the job of the courts, however, to decide whether a tax return disclosure requirement is good policy or makes political sense. Those are questions delegated to the political branches of the federal government, that is Congress and the President, under Articles I and II of the United States Constitution. Those are the branches that make the law. Article III Courts such as this one, on the other hand, are tasked with interpreting the law and evaluating whether laws passed by the other two branches of federal government or by the states are constitutional in the first place. The job of the federal courts is therefore to follow the law and to decide questions based on the United States Constitution, which is the only thing the Court is being asked to do in these cases. Courts created under Article III of the United States Constitution are not concerned with political victories or who may or may not "win." Instead, it is the Court's job to make sure the Constitution wins. To that end, while this Court understands and empathizes with the motivations that prompted California to pass the Act, it concludes that a preliminary injunction should nonetheless issue because the Act's provisions likely violate the Constitution and the laws of the United States.

⁷ In fact, these are some of the same considerations our nation takes into account when evaluating individuals who have been confirmed by the United States Senate for security clearances.

A. Likelihood of Success on the Merits

1. Qualifications Clause

The Presidential Qualifications Clause of the United States Constitution sets forth the eligibility requirements for the Office of President:

No person except a natural born Citizen . . . shall be eligible to the Office of President; neither shall any person be eligible to that Office who shall not have attained to the Age of thirty five Years, and been fourteen Years a Resident within the United States.

U.S. Const., art. II, § 1, cl. 5.

The United States Supreme Court analyzed the Constitution's Qualifications Clauses in the seminal case, U.S. Term Limits, Inc. v. Thornton, 514 U.S. 779 (1995). There the Court held that the Framers intended the foregoing language to "fix as exclusive the qualifications in the Constitution," "thereby divest[ing] States of any power to add qualifications." Id. at 801, 806. The Court reasoned that "the text and structure of the Constitution, the relevant historical materials, and, most importantly, the "basic principles of our democratic system' all demonstrate that the Qualifications Clauses were intended to preclude the States from exercising any such power" Id. at 806. Significantly, the Court rejected any notion that a state can cloak an otherwise impermissible qualification as a ballot access issue subject to regulation by the states under the Elections Clause,⁸ stating that states cannot indirectly create new eligibility requirements by "dressing eligibility to stand for [public office] in ballot access clothing." Id. at 831.

Factually, the Term Limits Court was confronted with an amendment to the state constitution of Arkansas which would have prohibited any candidate having served more than three years in the United States House of Representatives, or two years in the United States Senate, from appearing on the state's general election ballot for federal congressional office. The Court held this attempt to alter federal eligibility

⁸ The Elections Clause allows states to set the "times, places and manner" of holding elections. U.S. Const., art I, § 4, cl. 1.

1 unconstitutional.⁹ In delineating the line between a state’s permissible power to craft 2 procedural requirements designed to foster ballot access and its impermissible power to 3 create new substantive qualifications for federal office, the Term Limits Court noted that 4 a statute certainly crosses that line if it “has the likely effect of handicapping a class of 5 candidates and has the sole purpose of creating additional qualifications indirectly.” Id.
6 at 836.

7 The Ninth Circuit, in Schaefer v. Townsend, 215 F.3d 1031 (9th Cir. 2000), further 8 illuminated the applicable standard by explaining that a statute creates a new, 9 unconstitutional qualification for federal office if it either “create[s] an absolute bar to 10 candidates who would otherwise qualify,” or “ha[s] the likely effect of handicapping an 11 otherwise qualified class of candidates.” Id. at 1035. The regulation at issue there 12 required that candidates for federal office be registered voters, and therefore residents of 13 the State of California, at the commencement of any candidacy for federal office.
14 California took the position that the regulation was a mere ballot access restriction 15 passed under its authority to regulate the time, place, and manner of federal elections.
16 There, as here, the State argued that it had the power to adopt “generally-applicable and 17 evenhanded restrictions that protect the integrity and reliability of the electoral process 18 itself.” Id. at 1037 (quoting Anderson v. Celebrezze, 460 U.S. 780, 788 (1983)).

19 That court disagreed. According to the Ninth Circuit, regulations passing 20 constitutional muster under the Elections Clause regulated election procedures only and 21 “did not even arguably impose any substantive qualification rendering a class of potential 22 candidates ineligible for a ballot position.” Id. at 1038 (citing Term Limits, 514 U.S. at 23 835). While control over the procedural aspect of an election or requiring a candidate to 24 ⁹ The Term Limits Court noted that the provision at issue there applied only to congressional office 25 under Article I of the Constitution, but it strongly intimated that the same rationale applied with just as 26 much force to the Qualifications Clause of Article II. Indeed, the Court made clear that states “have just as 27 much right, and no more, to prescribe new qualifications for a representative, as they have for a 28 president.” Id. at 803. Moreover, the Court observed that the Qualifications Clauses “reflect the idea that the Constitution treats both the President and Members of Congress as federal officers” over which the states only have delegated, as opposed to reserved, powers. Id. at 805 n. 17. The fact that the Term Limits Court referred to “Qualifications Clauses” in the plural further suggests that its reasoning applies equally to presidential qualifications.

1 show a minimum level of support before running (and potentially crowding the ballot)¹⁰
 2 may be permissible, Schaefer found that the residency requirement before it was not.
 3 Instead, it plainly handicapped those candidates who did not comply and had the effect 4 of deterring them from running. Id.

5 Similarly, although the Act challenged in this case does not present an absolute 6 bar to candidates running for office, it is equally clear that, like in Schaefer, it has the 7 likely effect of “handicapping” non-disclosing candidates. The Act has nothing to do with 8 the extent of support a candidate may enjoy and plays no role in ensuring that 9 procedural integrity of the election. To the contrary, it prevents a number of candidates 10 from appearing on the primary ballot absent disclosure of their tax returns, and in so 11 doing impairs their ability to win California’s Republican presidential primary election, to 12 obtain the support of California’s delegates to the Republican National Convention, and 13 to secure the party’s nomination for President. This complete denial of ballot access 14 constitutes a severe handicap because “there is no denying that the ballot restrictions 15 will make it significantly more difficult for the barred candidate to win the election.”
 16 514 U.S. at 831.¹¹ It follows that barring candidates in this manner is the type of burden 17 that “demands serious constitutional scrutiny.” Short v. Brown, 893 F.3d at 677.

18 The State’s Claim that the Act is a procedural “times, places and manner” 19 requirement permissible under the Elections Clause is simply not viable. Unsurprisingly, 20 the Term Limits Court held that the Elections Clause implicitly prohibits states from 21 enacting provisions designed to benefit or to hinder certain candidates. Term Limits, 22 514 U.S. at 833-34 (“[T]he Framers understood the Elections Clause as a grant of 23 ¹⁰ See, e.g., Lubin v. Panish, 415 U.S. 709, 715, 718-19 (1974) (a state may restrict ballot access 24 to eliminate as many “frivolous candidac[ies]” as possible by requiring candidates to “demonstrat[e] the 25 existence of some reasonable quantum of voter support” through, for example, petitions signed by voters); 26 Ill State Bd. of Elections v. Socialist Workers Party, 440 U.S. 173, 185 (1979) (“[W]e have upheld properly drawn statutes that require a preliminary showing of a significant modicum of support before a candidate or party may appear on the ballot.”).

27 ¹¹ While the State argues that the disclosure requirement does not apply to the general election, 28 that distinction does not save the Act since the Supreme Court has long held that constitutional requirements apply just as squarely to primaries as they do to the general election. See Tashjian v.
Republican Party, 479 U.S. 208, 227 (1986).

1 authority to issue procedural regulations, and not as a source of power to dictate 2 electoral outcomes, to favor or disfavor a class of candidates, or to evade important 3 constitutional restraints”) (emphasis added). The procedural grant of power to the states 4 extended by the Elections Clause instead “encompasses matters like ‘notices, 5 registration, supervision of voting, protection of voters, prevention of fraud and corrupt 6 practices, counting of votes, duties of inspectors and canvassers, and making and 7 publication of election returns.’” Cook v. Gralike, 531 U.S. 510, 523-24 (2001) (citing 8 Smiley v. Holm, 285 U.S. 355, 366 (1932)).

9 To the extent the Act mandates disclosure of tax returns to qualify for the 10 presidential primary, it does none of those things and, despite Defendants’ best efforts, it 11 simply cannot be characterized as procedural. Its provisions do not pertain to the 12 administration of an election (e.g., reducing ballot clutter by excluding candidates without 13 sufficient electoral support). Nor can it be considered an even-handed restriction to 14 “protect the integrity and reliability of the electoral process itself” or to ensure “orderly, 15 fair, and honest elections” by providing financial information to voters. Term Limits, 16 514 U.S. at 834. If this was truly the State’s even-handed objective, it presumably would 17 have passed some version of the Act in 1992, when former California Governor Jerry 18 Brown elected not to release his tax returns while running for the Democratic nomination 19 for President. At base, the Act seeks to punish a class of candidates who elect not to 20 comply with disclosing their tax returns by handicapping their access to the electoral 21 process.¹² This is plainly impermissible.

22 The Supreme Court’s decision in Cook v. Gralicke, 531 U.S. 510 (2001), is also 23 helpful in underscoring the conclusion that this Act is constitutionally impermissible. In 24 that case, Missouri passed an initiative that required ballots to disclose whether federal

25 ¹² The State’s argument that a “class of constitutional concern” must be identified in order to entitle 26 a group of candidates to qualify for such protection, and that no qualifying class in that respect has been 27 identified here, is unpersuasive. Defs.’ Opp, 8:25-27. Despite the State’s contention, no authority for any 28 such limitation has been identified. Instead, by barring all qualifications other than those set out in the Constitution, the Framers exhibited concern for all “candidates who would otherwise meet the requirements of the Qualifications Clause.” Schaefer, 215 F.3d at 1035. To read the phrase “class of constitutional concern” otherwise would nullify the Qualifications Clause.

1 candidates for the House and Senate supported Congressional term limits. Id. at 514.
2 Missouri defended its legislation on grounds that it “merely regulated the manner in 3 which elections are held by disclosing information about congressional candidates” and 4 consequently was a valid exercise of Missouri’s delegated power under the Elections 5 Clause. Id. at 523. The Supreme Court disagreed, finding that the law bore “no relation 6 to the ‘manner’ of elections as we understand it.” Id. Instead, the law was “plainly 7 designed to favor candidates” supporting term limits in an attempt to handicap those 8 candidates who did not. Id. at 524. According to the Court, the Constitution’s grant of 9 power to the states “to prescribe the procedural mechanisms for federal elections” does 10 not include the ability “to dictate electoral outcomes, to favor or disfavor a class of 11 candidates, or to evade important constitutional constraints.” Id. at 523.

12 Moreover, the Court pointed out, “by directing the citizen’s attention to the single 13 consideration of the candidate’s fidelity to term limits,” the Missouri law implied that the 14 issue was “an important—perhaps paramount—consideration in the citizen’s choice.” Id.
15 at 525. It, therefore, could potentially, “decisively influence the citizen to cast his ballot 16 against candidates branded as unfaithful” to the idea of term limits. Id. Similarly in this 17 case, the Act draws undue attention to that class of candidates electing not to disclose 18 their tax returns, and by so doing operates to brand them as inferior. As such, the Act 19 imposes an additional substantive qualification beyond the exclusive confines of the 20 Qualifications Clause and is likely invalid on that basis as well.

21 Furthermore, from a practical perspective, allowing individual states to potentially 22 adopt disparate and inconsistent qualifications for presidential primary candidates 23 tramples the Framers’ vision of having uniform standards for the qualifications of those 24 individuals running for President. Former California Governor Jerry Brown’s admonition 25 in vetoing the Act’s earlier iteration is particularly instructive on this point. If allowed to 26 stand, the Act would potentially open the floodgates permitting each state to foreclose 27 ballot access to presidential candidates on various alleged informational grounds. The 28 Court can easily foresee this extending far beyond tax information to the disclosure of 1 confidential medical records, psychiatric and therapist records, academic records, family

2 law records, or other privileged information.¹³ The list of allegedly “relevant” information 3 required to obtain ballot access could therefore snowball out of control with no practical 4 limitation as legislatures throughout the nation could impose their own qualifications on 5 presidential candidates, perhaps for nakedly political purposes. That result cannot 6 possibly comport with the Framers’ goal for a fixed and nationwide standard for such 7 federal offices.

8 Finally, in this day and age of partisan politics, evaluating the constitutionality of 9 the Act is one of the most non-partisan questions of which the Court can conceive. At 10 oral argument, there were repeated references to this being a “Republican” issue, but 11 the protections afforded by the Qualifications Clause extend to all candidates 12 irrespective of their political affiliation. While this case concerns a law passed by a 13 Democratic majority in the California Legislature, and while it fundamentally targets a 14 Republican presidential candidate, in a different political climate or a different state the 15 roles and putative requirements could easily be reversed. The dangerous precedent set 16 by this Act, allowing the controlling party in any state’s legislature to add substantive 17 requirements as a precondition to qualifying for the state’s presidential primary ballot, 18 should concern all candidates alike, Republican, Democrat, or otherwise. It certainly 19 concerns the Court. But ultimately, neither the Constitution nor the Court are concerned 20 with which party a candidate or voter most closely aligns. As such, for all of the reasons 21 set forth above, the Court finds that Plaintiffs are likely to prevail on their contention that 22 the Act violates that Clause.

23 ///

24 ///

25 ¹³ It is not difficult to imagine that a state could find, for example, just as compelling a reason to 26 force release of a candidate’s mental and physical health records for “informational” purposes, particularly 27 where a candidate might be older or have some preexisting health concerns. The troubling minefield this 28 presents is all too apparent in terms of permitting each state to make its own informational demands.
While there is little analytical difference in terms of the Act’s stated “informational” purpose from the alleged “information” that such records might provide, the invasion of privacy concerns would make any such mandate almost assuredly unconstitutional.

2. First Amendment Rights of Association and Ballot Access

The Constitution guarantees, among other things, “the right of individuals to associate for the advancement of political beliefs, and the right of qualified voters, regardless of their political persuasion, to cast their votes effectively.” Ill. State Bd. of Elections, 440 U.S. at 184 (quoting Williams v. Rhodes, 393 U.S. 23, 30 (1968)). Ballot access restrictions “implicate the right to vote” because “limiting the choices available to voters . . . impairs the voter’s ability to express their political preferences.” Id. The rights of individual voters to associate with, and vote for, the candidate of their choice “rank among our most precious freedoms.” Williams, 393 U.S. at 30-31 (citing Wesberry v. Sanders, 376 U.S. 1, 17 (1964)). Moreover, as the Supreme Court also noted, the “freedom to associate as a political party” also “has diminished practical value if the party can be kept off the ballot.” Ill. State Bd. Of Elections, 440 U.S. at 184.

According to Plaintiffs, by barring partisan presidential candidates who decline to release their tax returns from appearing on the California primary ballot, the Act imposes a severe burden on voters’ ability to access the ballot and vote for the candidate of their choice. Additionally, President Trump further claims that the Act similarly burdens his ability to appear on the Republican primary ballot and to associate with Republican voters in California. The Trump Campaign as well as the Republican National Committee and the California Republican Party make similar arguments.

To evaluate these arguments, the Court applies the so-called Anderson/Burdick test established by the Supreme Court in Anderson v. Celebrezze, 460 U.S. 780 (1983) and Burdick v. Takushi, 504 U.S. 428 (1982). To the extent that voting rights “are subjected to ‘severe’ restrictions, the regulation must be ‘narrowly drawn to advance a state interest of compelling importance,’” with a strict level of scrutiny therefore imposed. Burdick, 504 U.S. at 434 (quoting Norman v. Reed, 502 U.S. 279, 289 (1992)). Should the restriction at issue trigger less than strict scrutiny, a balancing test is instead employed. Courts must weigh 1) the character and magnitude of the asserted injury to the rights protected by the First and Fourteenth Amendments; 2) the precise interests

1 and justifications put forward by the state for the imposed ballot restriction; and 3) the 2 extent to which the state's interests make it necessary to burden the plaintiff's rights.
 3 See Anderson, 460 U.S. at 789. Even restrictions that impose a lesser burden in this 4 regard must be reasonably related to furthering the state's important regulatory interests.
 5 Chamness v. Bowen, 722 F.3d 1110, 1116, (9th Cir. 2013). To the extent the 6 presidential race is national in scope, a state's interests in regulating presidential 7 elections is weaker than for purely statewide elections. Anderson, 460 U.S. at 795.¹⁴

8 Here, the Act creates what amounts to a functional bar against the ability to cast 9 an effective vote for a candidate who elects not to disclose his or her tax returns. It 10 further interferes with the ability of both individuals and political parties to select the 11 individual presidential candidate of their choice to act as the "standard bearer who best 12 represents [their] ideologies and preferences." Eu v. San Francisco Democratic Comm., 13 489 U.S. 214, 224 (1989).¹⁵ In this case that includes the incumbent President of the 14 United States. These are severe restrictions, since limitations on ballot access can 15 violate multiple constitutionally-protected interests, including the right to associate for 16 political purposes, the right to vote, and the right to express political preferences.¹⁶

17 ¹⁴ While the State disagrees, insisting that "the Act regulates only California's presidential primary 18 election, the result of which is determined by in-state voters" (Defs.' Opp, 11:21-23), that argument misses 19 the mark. As a practical matter, presidential primaries impact the primaries in other states and therefore 20 impact the general election as well. Indeed, California's recent change in moving its primary from June to March appears in part to have been intended to garner more say in the national nominating process. See
 SB 568 Primary Elections: Election Date, California Legislative Information, "Bill Analysis" Tab, Assembly
 Floor Analysis 2 (Sept. 13, 2017).

21 ¹⁵ It is also no small matter that where, as here, the limitation on ballot access involves a 22 candidate at the top of the primary ticket in California. A restriction on the ability to vote for that candidate 23 could likely depress the party's voter turnout in general, and therefore adversely affect down-ballot congressional and state-level candidates as well. This is particularly true in California since voters 24 approved a "Top Two Primary" system, where the two candidates receiving the most votes in the primary proceed to the general election regardless of their party affiliation. See Bryant Decl., Case No.19-cv-1506-MCE-DB, ECF No. 17-3, ¶¶ 11-13.

25 ¹⁶ The State nonetheless contends that any burden is only "slight" because all candidates are able 26 to disclose their financial interests if they choose to do so. But that is not the point. The logistical burdens 27 of disclosure in this case are minimal compared to the burden of constitutional concern, which is forcing candidates to make the choice between running for President and disclosing their tax returns. See 28 Schaefer, 215 F.3d at 1037 (forcing out-of-state candidates to choose between relocating or being barred from the ballot constituted an impermissible qualification). States cannot avoid the First Amendment's protections by disingenuously characterizing a condition as "voluntary," when it is fact coerced. See Term Limits, 514 U.S. at 829 ("As we have often noted, constitutional rights would be of little value if they could

1 Ill. State Bd. Of Elections, 440 U.S. at 184; Chamness, 722 F.3d at 1116 (a measure
2 which “significantly impairs” ballot access “imposes a severe First Amendment 3 restriction”).¹⁷ As such, they are subject to strict scrutiny.

4 The fact that a candidate can still conceivably qualify for the primary as a write-in 5 or independent candidate does not change that calculus. See Anderson, 460 U.S. at 6 799 n.26 (“We have previously noted that [a write-in] opportunity is not an adequate 7 substitute for having the candidate’s name appear on the printed ballot.”); Term Limits, 8 514 U.S. at 831 (“[E]ven if petitioners are correct that incumbents may occasionally win 9 reelection as write-in candidates, there is no denying that the ballot restrictions will make 10 it significantly more difficult for the barred candidate to win the election.”).

11 Nor can Defendants show that the Act is either narrowly drawn or serves a 12 compelling state interest. To the extent that the State argues that a candidate’s asserted 13 “choice” in deciding whether to disclose tax returns makes the restriction narrow in 14 scope, the Supreme Court’s decision in Cook is instructive. There, as indicated above, 15 the Supreme Court struck down a Missouri constitutional amendment which directed the 16 Secretary of State to identify on the ballot those candidates who did not support federal 17 term limits. That was also a “voluntary” act that the Court struck down as 18 unconstitutional. Yet this case goes even further in keeping a candidate’s name off the 19 ballot entirely, and Cook’s finding of unconstitutionality therefore applies with even more 20 force here.

21 Moreover, the Cook Court also rejected the argument that Missouri’s purported 22 objective in educating or notifying voters as to a candidate’s stance on terms limits was 23 compelling. While a state may educate voters as to the “procedural mechanisms” for 24 _____

25 be indirectly denied”). Moreover, the fact that candidates may be able to disclose their tax returns if they 26 so choose does not change the fact that voters also have a First Amendment right to associate with and 27 nominate candidates who refuse to do so.

28 ¹⁷ Requiring presidential candidates to disclose tax returns in order to exercise First Amendment rights to access voters is a severe burden both because of the fundamental nature of those rights and since, as the Ninth Circuit has recognized, “[a] tax return and related information contains many intimate details about the taxpayer’s personal and financial life” to which a taxpayer has a right of privacy. United States v. Richey, 924 F.2d 857, 861 (9th Cir. 1991).

1 federal elections, they cannot “dictate electoral outcomes, to favor or disfavor a class of 2 candidates” or “evade important constitutional restraints” under the guise of voter 3 education. Cook, 531 U.S. at 531. In this case, the State’s interest in doing so in the 4 first place is further weakened by the fact that the Act purports to restrict access to the 5 federal presidential primary, where it “has a less important interest” in regulation than in 6 statewide or local elections since the outcome of the race “will be largely determined by 7 voters beyond the State’s boundaries.” Anderson, 460 U.S. at 795.¹⁸ At the end of the 8 day a voter can simply decline to vote for a candidate who chooses not to release his or 9 her tax returns. Simply allowing voters to make that choice without further interference is 10 clearly the narrowest, and least intrusive, approach of all.

11 The State’s professed interest in voter education is somewhat specious in any 12 event because it does not extend to all candidates in every scenario. Instead, the Act 13 applies only to party-affiliated candidates (exempting independent and write-in 14 candidates) and affects only the primary, and not the general, election. If California 15 legitimately wanted to “provide voters with essential information regarding the 16 candidate’s potential conflicts of interest” to help them make a more informed decision, 17 as the interest statement contained in Government Code § 6881 indicates, it would keep 18 the tax returns public through the general election and not remove them from the 19 Secretary of State’s website once the primary election concludes. It is also difficult to 20 see how the Act’s mandate in directing production of tax returns is “narrowly drawn” to 21 protect the state’s purported interest in ensuring that voters are informed as to potential 22 conflicts of interest when the provisions of EIGA already require candidates to submit 23 detailed financial information concerning the extent of income, gifts and property 24 holdings as well as the identification of any positions held in a business enterprise. See 25 5 U.S.C.A. Appx. 4, § 102. The State has not identified anything missing on an EIGA 26 disclosure that could be found on a tax return to serve the Act’s purported interests.

27 ¹⁸ The fact that states have more leeway in regulating congressional elections under the Elections 28 Clause than they do in presidential elections is therefore not surprising. See, e.g., Arizona v. Inter Tribal Council of Arizona, Inc., 570 U.S. 1, 8 (2013); Rucho v. Common Cause, 139 S. Ct. 2484, 2495 (2019).

1 Accordingly, the Court concludes that Plaintiffs are likely to prevail on their claim that the 2 Act violates their First Amendment rights to freedom of association and ballot access.

3 3. Equal Protection under the Fourteenth Amendment

4 The Fourteenth Amendment's Equal Protection Clause guarantees that "[n]o state 5 shall . . . deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." U.S.
6 Const., amend. XIV, § 1. Two of the related cases, filed on behalf of the Griffin and 7 Melendez Plaintiffs (Case Nos. 2:19-cv-1477-MCE-DB and 2:19-cv-1506-MCE-DB, 8 respectively), argue that the Act is unconstitutional to the extent it requires a political 9 party's candidates for President to disclose his or her tax returns in the primary election 10 but exempts independent candidates from doing so. By distinguishing among 11 constitutionally eligible candidates for President in that manner, Plaintiffs argue that the 12 Act imposes greater burdens on the voting and associational rights of California voters 13 who support major party candidates than those who support independents. According to 14 Plaintiffs, this triggers equal protection concerns. See Lubin v. Panish, 415 U.S. at 716 15 ("The right of a party or an individual to a place on the ballot is entitled to protection and 16 is intertwined with the rights of voters"); see also Matsumoto v. Pua, 775 F.2d 1393, 17 1396 (9th Cir. 1985).

18 In Anderson, the Supreme Court cautioned courts to carefully scrutinize laws 19 which impose "burden[s] that fall unequally on major-party and independent candidates."
20 460 U.S. at 793-94; see also Soltysik v. Padilla, 910 F.3d 438, 446 (9th Cir. 2018) 21 (recognizing that plaintiff had stated valid equal protection claim where state law 22 imposed an "unequal burden" on independent as opposed to party-affiliated candidates).
23 While distinctions in how the two groups are treated may be permissible, that is only the 24 case where those distinctions are constitutionally relevant. Jenness v. Fortson, 403 U.S.
25 431, 441 (1971) (recognizing that the needs and potential of a political party with 26 historically broad support differ from a new or broad political organization, and that 27 consequently the latter may be exempt from having to establish all the criteria of a well-28 established party in order to participate in primaries).

1 The Ninth Circuit has recognized, however, that independent candidates seeking 2 to run in the general election are “essentially similar” to partisan candidates seeking to 3 run in a party primary. Van Susteren v. Jones, 331 F.3d 1024, 1027 (9th Cir. 2003).
4 Accordingly, there is no basis for subjecting the two groups to different burdens. The 5 State lacks any valid interest in providing voters with more information about party-6 backed candidates than independent candidates, especially when such requirements 7 can lead to the exclusion of only major party candidates from the ballot. Consequently, 8 Plaintiffs are likely to succeed in demonstrating that the differing burdens are 9 unconstitutional under the Equal Protection Clause as well.

10 4. Preemption by the Ethics in Government Act (“EIGA”)

11 Finally as to the merits, and as already mentioned above, Title I of EIGA provides 12 for the disclosure of “source, type, and amount or value of income”; honoraria from any 13 source; dividends, rents, interest, and capital gains, and interests in property; the “entity 14 and category of value of the total liabilities owed to any creditor”; and the identity of all 15 positions held “as an officer, director, trustee, partner, proprietor, representative, 16 employee, or consultant of any corporation, company, firm, partnership, or other 17 business enterprise, any nonprofit organization, any labor organization, or any 18 educational or other institution.” See generally 5 U.S.C.A. App. 4, § 102. Title I of the 19 EIGA also protects candidates from the need to make different or additional disclosure 20 by expressly displacing all other similar federal or state disclosure laws. It expressly 21 “supersede[s] any general requirement under any other provision of law or regulation 22 with respect to the reporting of information required for purposes of preventing conflicts 23 of interest or apparent conflicts of interest.” Id. at § 107(b).

24 Like EIGA, by requiring production of a candidate’s tax returns for the preceding 25 five years, the Act also purports to provide for the disclosure of extensive financial 26 information by candidates running for President, with one of its chief purposes being “to 27 provide voters with essential information regarding the candidates’ potential conflicts of 28 interest, business dealings, financial status, and charitable donations.” Cal. Elec. Code § 6881. As such, according to the Trump Plaintiffs, the Act is plainly a “law or regulation with respect to the reporting of information required for purposes of preventing conflicts of interest” as described by EIGA, and by EIGA’s express provisions it is preempted.

The State nonetheless claims that because § 107(b) makes no explicit reference to preemption of state law, and because a previous version of the statute did explicitly do so in another context, no preemptive intent should be inferred. See Defs.’ Opp., 27:21-28:11. In this regard, the State cites a presumption against preemption, in fields traditionally occupied by the states, unless the clear and manifest purpose of Congress suggests otherwise.

Defendants’ statement of the law may be correct, but it has no bearing here because regulation of federal officeholders is clearly not a field traditionally occupied by the states. Moreover, although the words “state” and “preemption” appear nowhere in the text of § 107(b), the statute is nonetheless unambiguous. Congress clearly intended that the EIGA “supersede” state laws touching on the field of financial disclosures and conflict-of-interest laws for federal officeholders. “Supersede” means to “[o]bliterate, set aside, annul, replace, make void, inefficacious or useless, repeal.” See Black’s Law Dictionary (6th ed. 1990). Section 107(b) of EIGA therefore “set[s] aside” and “replace[s]” “any general requirement under any other provision of law or regulation with respect to the reporting of information required for purposes of preventing conflicts of interest or apparent conflicts of interest.” By using the expansive term “any” with the phrase “other provision of law or regulation,” the plain and ordinary language of EIGA unambiguously gives it preemptive force over the Act.¹⁹ Plaintiffs are accordingly likely to prevail on the merits with respect to EIGA preemption as well.

B. Irreparable Harm

Moving on to the remaining inquiries in evaluating whether preliminary injunctive relief is warranted, the Court turns first to irreparable harm. The Ninth Circuit has long ¹⁹ Given the statute’s plain and ordinary meaning, any resort to legislative history is unnecessary. See Conn. Nat’l Bank v. Germain, 503 U.S. 249, 254 (1992).

1 recognized that constitutional violations in general constitute irreparable harm. See, 2 e.g., Stormans, Inc. v. Stelecky, 586 F.3d 1109, 1138 (9th Cir. 2009) (“constitutional 3 violations cannot be adequately remedied through damages” and therefore generally 4 constitute irreparable harm); Goldie’s Bookstore, Inc. v. Super. Ct., 739 F.2d 466, 472 5 (9th Cir. 1984) (an alleged constitutional infringement by deprivation of equal protection 6 “will often alone constitute irreparable harm.”). This is particularly true in cases, like this 7 one, challenging candidate qualifications restricting ballot access. See Matsumoto, 8 775 F.2d at 1395-96. The rationale for such a finding is simple: “If the plaintiffs lack an 9 adequate opportunity to gain placement on the ballot for this year’s election, this 10 infringement on their rights cannot be alleviated after the election.” Council of Alternative 11 Political Parties v. Hooks, 121 F.3d 876, 883 (3d Cir. 1997).

12 The Ninth Circuit has further emphasized that “the loss of First Amendment 13 freedoms, for even minimal periods of time, unquestionably constitutes irreparable 14 injury.” Klein v. City of San Clemente, 584 F.3d 1196, 1208 (9th Cir. 2009).

15 Given the findings above that Plaintiffs are likely to prevail in establishing 16 constitutional violations premised on both the Qualifications Clause, First Amendment 17 rights of association and ballot access, and Fourteenth Amendment rights grounded in 18 equal protection, this Court finds that the requisite irreparable harm is present and that 19 this factor weighs in favor of granting a preliminary injunction.

20 C. Balance of Equities

21 The balance of equities also weighs in Plaintiffs’ favor. The public interest served 22 by ensuring that individual voters may associate for the advancement of political beliefs 23 and cast a vote for their preferred candidate for President is extraordinary. Williams, 24 393 U.S. at 30-31. The State, on the other hand, “can derive no legally cognizable 25 benefit from being permitted to further enforce an unconstitutional limit on political 26 speech.” Sanders Cnty. Republican Cent. Comm. v. Bullock, 698 F.3d 741, 749 (9th Cir.
 27 2012). As the Ninth Circuit has explained, it is “clear that it would not be equitable or in 28 the public’s interest to allow the state . . . to violate the requirements of federal law,

1 especially when there are no adequate remedies available.” Valle del Sol, Inc. v.
2 Whiting, 732 F.3d 1006, 1029 (9th Cir. 2013). Simply raising a “serious First 3 Amendment question[] compels a finding . . . that the balance of hardships tips sharply in 4 Plaintiffs’ favor.” Am. Beverage Ass’n v. City & Cty. Of San Francisco, 916 F.3d 749, 5 758 (9th Cir. 2019). Therefore, a consideration of the balance of equities also points to 6 the propriety of a preliminary injunction in this matter.

7 D. Public Interest

8 Finally, as the Ninth Circuit noted in American Beverage, “it is always in the public 9 interest to prevent the violation of a party’s constitutional rights.” Id. at 758. This factor 10 accordingly also weighs in favor of an injunction here.

11 12 CONCLUSION

13
14 As set forth above, the Court finds that Plaintiffs are likely to prevail on the merits 15 of their arguments that the Act 1) violates the Presidential Qualifications Clause 16 contained in Article II of the United States Constitution; 2) deprives Plaintiffs of their 17 rights to associate and/or to access the ballot, as guaranteed by the First Amendment of 18 the Constitution; 3) further violates the Constitution’s Equal Protection Clause as set 19 forth in the Fourteenth Amendment; and 5) is preempted by the provisions of EIGA in 20 any event.

21 The Court further finds that Plaintiffs have demonstrated irreparable harm, have 22 shown that the balance of equities weighs in their favor, and have established to the 23 Court’s satisfaction that the public interest tips in favor of enjoining implementation of the 24 Act insofar as it pertains to candidates for President of the United States. Plaintiffs’ 25 various Motions for Preliminary Injunction in the related cases are therefore GRANTED.
